What's new:

It looks like new FF will be released a bit late this year. I'm not surprised seeing it will be late. They rushed the development of mage's degrees over the last year and this seems to be a new direction. Too bad. Update: NASA formally announced the end of human lunar exploration and the start of funding cuts to exploration on Earth. The US space agency formally ended human exploration of the moon last December, according to an internal NASA memo leaked to the Verge. A source told Gizmodo that the memo was dated December 18, 2018, and that the timetable detailed in it was accurate. The memo predicts that US human spaceflight will end in early 2021, with the final mission to the moon being Athena. The memo also details how NASA will transition from human lunar operations to robotic probes. The memo also lists four actions that need to be taken to ensure NASA makes the most of the next decade while it waits for stateside space taxis to launch. The program managers must build trust between different parts of the agency, foster new partnerships, coordinate NASA's scientific endeavors with other space agencies, and ensure that a global decision-making process takes place. The memo leaked to Gizmodo was apparently written by Bill Gerstenmaier, NASA's associate administrator for human spaceflight, although Gerstenmaier denied that the memo was real, a spokesperson told Gizmodo. "This memo is not accurate and does not reflect the plan that has been developed and the direction that I have been discussing, consulting with and leading through since last December," Gerstenmaier said. "The future course of American human spaceflight will be determined following the successful integration of the Commercial Crew Program vehicles, which are currently scheduled to launch in the summer of 2020.” In December 2018, NASA officially canceled the Artemis program. The space agency’s lunar exploration plans had long been thought to be short on money, although last February NASA announced that it would invest $1.6 billion into Artemis and was further investing $1.6 billion into the lunar Gateway Program. The memo then predicts, based on discussions with other NASA centers, that the US will end up paying about $4 billion to $6 billion per year to keep NASA running for 10 years. It also talks about a lawsuit brought by Ariane 5 manufacturer Airbus against NASA in 2017, in which Airbus wanted access to US taxpayer dollars that NASA

Capsizing Out The newest game released from Kumamotus, Tarnished, focuses on a great premise--making a RPG where you take on the role of a devil in order to coerce humans into serving some obscene and by turns hilarious and dark purpose. The concept is a novel one and Tarnished wastes no time in getting it to the party to start drinking and making mischief. From the get-go, the game's premise of the four members of the devilism hillbillies is a slick way to introduce the characters to the player. Delightful. The bright and colorful environments of the towns and dungeons, along with the gameplay of not only reading situations but finding group members to act with, adds an interactive element to the RPG package. One question I had in the beginning was how the devilism hillbillies would affect the game. Truth be told, the hillbillies act from time to time to some pretty memorable moments. Also, human actors can be recruited to be gracekeepers, a rare occurrence in RPGs. These are almost always elfesque or humanesque; sadly, I'd like to add that the hillbillies can't stand to stay away from no one, human or otherwise. I'm sure they will make enjoyable opposition when times are dire, too. So far, the supporting cast of three from the hillbillies does a good job at putting a character on the screen. The three fit together well and there are simply enough differences that they can easily be differentiated from one another. The male hillbilly seems more of an slouch, as can be expected from the image. The female, Nana, is also rather rotund, wearing the town's top hat everywhere. Sadly, comparisons to the first female Gracekeeper are unavoidable. DQ
