How to resolve the ongoing Microsoft Meltdown/Spectre bug By Matt Bach, Jan 2 2018 11:18AM The ever present warning of a remote code execution bug has now expanded to encompass all PCs, not just those sold on Amazon.com. According to the New York Times, the vulnerability could be exposed through the use of a "value returned to the kernel through an I/O request" that is "valid and trusted." This would allow someone to potentially write code that would be able to leverage all of the cores on a system, potentially leading to some serious problems. Security researchers are working on how to fix the flaw and are encouraging users to avoid the popular Amazon app marketplace until a fix is available. Most mainstream support for Windows ended a long time ago but it would be wise for any serious users of Internet Explorer 11 to turn off the use of Adobe Flash to avoid this issue. Besides, Microsoft's Edge browser has caught up in terms of functionality to IE 11 and it is highly recommended to upgrade your browser. According to security website Softpedia, a new report states that the vulnerability is most likely caused by the memory allocation software on the AMD Ryzen 7 and Ryzen 8 chips used in the servers and desktops. Some people have come forth saying that the Ryzen chips have a corrupted operating system, which could lead to the vulnerability. The websites claimed that the problem is under investigation by AMD and Microsoft. The report did not specify if it was a CPU failure or an operating system failure or both, though it seems to be related to the OS. AMD has not yet responded to the complaints.
